But he has no such justification. He acted his threatening part while the Government which he had sworn to sustain had not a single enemy in arms and had suffered no interruption of its duties. Nor had the Government absolved him from his pledge by violating, in its own policy, the functions and promises under which that pledge had been obtained.

There is one more point. A settled principle of law is that "any- American influence in the Western thing necessary to keep a State from anarchy is absolutely necessary." What, we may ask, is likely to be more productive of that danger than the official countenance be looked upon by future historians and support of men who are plotting and commentators as providential, the overthrow of the Government both as regards his own country and aiding and abetting its enemies?
